The selected work being shown was born out of an encounter with illuminated manuscripts some years ago by the artist Terry Donsen Feder. In her paintings there are two perceived spaces that reside on a shared surface. One is reflected and blurred. The other illustrated and clear.

As she says, "In medieval manuscripts, words or music or design form a flat plane. In the center of a page is a scene that suggests you might be able to enter into if you read the text or sing the music or perform the devotions written on the page."

"I use oil paint and primer on metal. In my work the unpainted metal surrounding the image forms the flat plane, and there's a painted illusionistic image in the center very different from the flatness of the metal. I often work from photographs and sketches of landscapes. The painted center is about hand and expression, the metal about machine, even technology. Contradictions we live with."

The artist lives and works in Farmington Connecticut.
