“Travis Durden is a pseudonym, as the Parisian artist behind the project would prefer his art be the center of attention, not himself. Fascinated by the construction of myths & idols, he investigates how we, as humans, determine what will be raised to popular culture or elevated to divine cult, and how history has influenced us in making this choice.

This series is the first of a new process in which he questions the similarities between objects of cult from different periods in time by confronting them head on. The idea of mixing contemporary culture with Renaissance depictions of classical subjects came to him as he was sitting-in in the famed Ecole du Louvre’s open-to-the-public lectures. He realized how, in our society, as entire collections are being scanned or digitized, the emotional impact of these pieces may be diminished because they are now just part of an endless gallery, and paradoxically eventually fall into oblivion.

Bringing together ancient classical art and modern culture is a way for the latter to contribute to the preservation of the former, it is an invitation to go back and rediscover our ancestors’ work before we, the general public, forget about them.
