"It would be self-serving to quote the many writers, poets, musicians and astrophysicists about how the Stars have shaped our humanity; spiritually and philosophically.

But on an artistic level, creating these Starfield paintings has taught me patience. Patience to see there is infinite beauty in the things we call familiar, and the blackness, the emptiness of space is not so black nor so empty." – J.W.

EBK Gallery is pleased to exhibit the new "StarField" paintings by Hartford artist Jason Werner, during the month of June.

I have to admit, how unexpected my reaction was when I first saw the finished canvases. How can the depiction of such vast emptiness offer up a sense of place and belonging? Even comfort. Makes no sense, right? But that's the paradox my mind was caught in. It occurs to me oftentimes a creative mind can see farther into the universe than technology can in a way.

I'd rather look up into a clear starry night sky and dream, then look at a picture of it I took on my smart phone. The paintings on exhibit evoke that wonder. Pretty amazing.

Here's an intriguing thought...every day as a mason, Werner works with the most ancient materials on earth. By night he paints the stars our planet and us are made from. -E.B.K.

Jason and his wife Gina live and work in Hartford, Connecticut along with their trusty pal (dog) Maz.
